In the year 884 BC, there were several fierce wars raging among the states of ancient Greece. Hoping for peace, one of the young brave male rulers of the states, King Iphitos of Elis, proposed that the games be held that would please the gods and therefore restore peace to the land. The games he referred to are what we know today as the Olympic Games. The symbol of the Olympic games is a series of five colorful rings. The rings are linked together from left to right. This symbol represents the union of 5 continents (Asia, Australia, Europe, the Americas and Africa) and joining together of athletes from around the world. During the Olympic games, a sacred orange sulfur flame was set to burn continuously on the gigantic metal altar of Zeus in Olympia. Since then, the flame is relit each time the games are held. The flame is extinguished only at the end of all the games. The Olympic motto is "citius, altius, fortius" meaning "swifter, higher, stronger".
